

Social Theory of Knowledge II 209

In the course titled “Social Theory of Knowledge II”, as in the above presented, students have the chance to become aware about the most recent aspects claiming that knowledge is a social product. It could be considered as a follow up of the Social Theory of Knowledge I, but it can be selected and attended independently from the Social Theory of Knowledge I. The module emphasizes (i) in demonstrating interests as knowledge forming elements according to the Edinburgh School (that is Barry Barnes and David Bloor) and (ii) to display accounts of knowledge radiating from Latour and Woolgar to Pels.

Students that will choose this course will have the chance to constitute a novel and most up to-date picture about knowledge forming procedures.

Lessons are presented as lectures, but students can ask questions during teaching time. Either an essay (under professor’s help and tutelage) concerning the subject matters that are taught or oral exams are options for the module’s grading. Smaller essays, about 1500 words, presented by the students in the classroom, contribute up to 30% of total grading.
